PENSIONIREFORMIDEST EUROOPA RIIKIDES : VALIK RAAMATUID JA ARTIKLEID

Riikliku pensionikindlustuse peamine eesmärk on tagada inimestele pensionipõlveks piisav sissetulek. Pensioni suurusele seab piirid riigi rahaline suutlikkus, mis omakorda sõltub oluliselt tööealiste inimeste arvust ja nende makstud sotsiaalmaksust. Eesti rahvaarv väheneb prognoside järgi aastaks 2060 seniselt 1,31-lt miljonilt 1,11 miljonini. 18-63-aastaste inimeste arv väheneb 256 000 võrra ehk 32%. Üle 63-aastaste inimeste arv suureneb 106 000 inimese võrra ehk 41%.

Töötajate ja pensionäride suhte prognoos näitab, et kui viimasel 20 aastal on olnud keskmiselt üle kahe töötaja ühe vanaduspensionäri kohta, siis aastaks 2060 langeb see alla 1,3. Inimeste eluiga järest pikeneb ja seetõttu pikeneb ilma pensioniiga töstmata ka pensioniloleku aeg. Selline areng tooks kaasa pensionide vähenemise: muudatusi tegemata langeb keskmise vanaduspensioni summa tulevikus alla 300 euro. See on probleem, millega tuleb tegeleda juba täna.

This article investigates how European welfare states respond to reform pressures arising from European integration. We focus on the field of public pensions and examine the impact of two institutional variables that mediate the impact of reform pressures: the extent of public pension provision and the number of national political veto points. We argue that, all else equal, member-states with few veto points and a relatively small public pension sector are the most likely cases of policy change in response to europeanization, whereas member-states with a high number of veto points and extensive public pension commitments are the least likely candidates for policy change. We test these arguments in four cases of europeanization in three countries (Belgium, the Netherlands and Italy).

Banyár, József. Possible reforms of pay-as-you-go pension systems // European Journal of Social Security. Vol. 18 (2016), issue 3, p. 286-308.

This study outlines and compares the possible ways of reforming modern, pay-as-you-go (PAYG) pension systems – reforms which are necessitated by unfavourable demographic processes. This comparison is made in a general context and the examination does not focus on any specific country. Pension reform ideas usually stay within the pension paradigm outlined by Samuelson ('AI scenario'). While also describing these approaches, the study points out – citing lesser-known ideas in this context – that there are several ways out of the situation. [---]

Using the taxation system as a means of supporting contributions to pensions is a long standing and increasingly important policy tool. This paper examines the effectiveness of that tool using new data for Ireland in 2014. Looking at contributions from employees, employers and individuals into private pensions, we show the relatively small size of most pension contributions and highlight the challenges these imply for the adequacy of future pension income. This article evaluates the pension policy pathways of the 11 former state socialist nations that have joined the European Union since 2004. Focusing primarily on the post-2004 period, the analysis discusses the most important measurable outcomes of these countries' pension reforms, in terms of poverty alleviation, pension adequacy and fiscal sustainability. Going beyond the quantifiable concepts, we also investigate the quality of the 11 countries' pension systems in terms of equity as well as efficiency, emphasizing the less conspicuous design errors present in these systems. Although these errors have received little attention to date, they may harm pension schemes along several dimensions, including their fiscal sustainability.

Ebbinghaus, Bernhard. Multipillarisation remodelled: the role of interest organizations in British and German pension reforms // Journal of European Public Policy. Vol. 26 (2019), issue 4, p. 521-539.

Recent reforms have responded to demographic ageing and fiscal challenges by shifting toward the multipillarisation of pensions to achieve financial sustainability. Reforms towards privatization and marketization of retirement income provision occurred in Britain and Germany with different pension system legacies. While public opinion supports largely the status quo, the stakeholders, in particular, organized capital and labour, have evolved in their positions towards pension reforms. The analysis seeks to draw out how organized interests have sought to influence multipillarisation but also adapted their strategies in the context of increasing financialisation in the two political economies. Enev, P. Reforms in the pension systems of Bulgaria and Poland – comparative analysis // Trakia Journal of Science. Vol. 15 (2017), suppl.1, p. 305-310.

The socio-economic changes occurred after 1989, face the problems of the pension systems of Bulgaria and Poland. The challenges faced by the social security systems called for a completely new reforming philosophy. A multi-pillar model of social protection has been introduced with the specifics in both countries. The article's main goal is to follow the reforms implemented in the social security systems of Bulgaria and Poland by examining individual solutions in the field of social security policy, pointing out current challenges and trends in the two pension systems. Goedemé, Tim ; Marchal, Sarah. Exploring a blind spot in comparative pension reform research: long-term trends in non-contributory pensions in Europe // International Journal of Social Welfare. Vol. 25 (2016), issue 2, p. 161-175.

Over the past two decades, pension reforms have been high on the agenda of social policy makers in Europe. In many countries, these reforms have resulted in less generous public pensions. At the same time, minimum income protection for older adults has received attention from policy makers, but much less so from social policy researchers. Therefore, this study explored how benefit levels of non-contributory minimum income schemes for older adults evolved from 1992 to 2012 in 13 'old' member states. Building on two cross-national longitudinal datasets with comparative data on minimum income protection in Europe, the study shows that over the past 20 years, the erosion of the principal safety net of last resort for older persons has been limited. Moreover, a substantial number of European countries have pursued a deliberate policy of considerably increasing minimum income benefits.

Grech, Aaron George. Pension policy design changes in EU countries since the mid-1990s // International Journal of Social Welfare. Vol. 24 (2015), issue 3, p. 296-304.

Recent decades have been characterised by significant pension reforms. This article reviews this process, focusing on five policy design issues that have concerned policymakers: optimising poverty alleviation effectiveness; redefining the state's role in smoothing incomes over the life-course; balancing contributions to benefits; adjusting the system to respond to demographic, economic and social changes; and ensuring that reforms will be long-lasting. While the role of state pensions is diminishing, there is a growing realisation of the need to ensure that they remain adequate, reigniting interest in minimum pensions and contribution credits. Hohnerlein, Eva Maria. Pension indexation for retirees revisited – normative patterns and legal standards // Global Social Policy (2019/April) p. 1-20.

Maintaining adequate pension levels throughout the entire retirement phase is a persistent challenge in old-age protection. Most public pension schemes in OECD (Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development) countries provide for some form of indexation for pensions in payment. These mechanisms have been object of frequent revisions for different purposes, in particular across Europe. This article explores the social and financial policy objectives linked to standard indexation parameters in public pension schemes, and offers a rough taxonomy of additional factors used to modify traditional indexation arrangements, with a special focus on changing rules and practices adopted in the European Union (EU) area after the 2008 international economic and financial crisis. This paper analyses the distributional effects of the Polish old-age pension reform introduced in 1999. Following a benchmark Mincer earnings equation, and using a newly developed microsimulation model we project future pension benefits for males born in years 1969-1979. We find that inequality of predicted first pension benefits measured by the Gini coefficient increases from 0.119 to 0.165 for cohorts of men retiring between 2036 and 2046. The observed increased inequality of pension benefits is due to the decreasing share of initial capital that is based on a more generous DB formula in the total accumulated pension capital. At the same time, inequality in replacements rates decreases due to a stronger link between contributions paid through the entire working life and pension benefits.

Komp, Kathrin. Shifts in the realized retirement age: Europe in times of pension reform and economic crisis // Journal of European Social Policy. Vol. 28 (2018), issue 2, p. 130-142.

Many recent policy reforms aimed to delay retirement. Such a delay seems important because population ageing makes it a necessity for financially sound pension schemes and a sufficiently large workforce. However, pension reforms do not only affect when people retire, they likewise affect what influences the realized retirement age. Moreover, the 2008 economic crisis restructured labour markets, thereby affecting retirement. This article investigates recent shifts in the realized retirement age and influences on it. It does this through multilevel analyses of international data from the survey of health, ageing and retirement in Europe. It compares individuals who retired in 2005/2006 to those who retired in 2012/2013, thereby identifying changes over time. [--]

Loužek, Marek. Pension reform in the Czech Republic after 2010 // Post-Communist Economies. Vol. 26 (2014), issue 1, p. 89-102.

The aim of this article is to analyse pension reform in the Czech Republic after 2010. Pension reform in the Czech Republic has gained new pace. The panel of consultants and experts on pension reform recommended mandatory saving in funds. The Constitutional Court ruled that citizens with higher incomes during their professional careers should receive higher pensions. The government responded by a minor amendment to the Pension Insurance Act and also prepared a major pension reform, which has introduced an opt-out, albeit on a fairly modest scale. The political risks of the current pension reform are considerable. [--]

This paper provides a summary of pension policy reforms in Europe. It focuses on the fate of the pension paradigm that has dominated recent decades: so-called pension privatisation. Such a paradigm consists of the full or partial replacement of social security pension schemes with pension systems based on individual, private pension savings accounts. This model has been implemented in many countries. [--]

Nyqvist, Anette. Insecurity in an orange envelope: national pension system reform in Sweden // PoLAR: Political and Legal Anthropology Review. Vol. 38 (2015), issue 2, p. 265-278.

In this article, I examine the implications of Sweden's reformed national pension system and how this policy reconfigures the state-citizen relationship. By applying the methodological approach of 'studying through,' the study depicts a shift in responsibility from a state level to an individual level. More specifically, I here shed light on how politicians, technocrats, and bureaucrats work to educate and foster the general public into responsible, hard working and financially literate citizens. The article further reveals that such attempts are not readily accepted or adopted by the citizens at the receiving end of the pension policy and so, instead of providing stability and security, this social security policy invokes a sense of insecurity in Swedish citizens.

Suárez Corujo, Borja. Pension system reforms in times of austerity: the Spanish case // Journal of Social Security Law. Vol. 24 (2017), issue 2, p. 82-98

This article examines the impact that the economic crisis has had on pension systems and how it has influenced the development of pension policies in the EU, and particularly in Spain. It is divided into two parts. The first one focuses on the main challenges currently faced by pension systems in Europe – the threat of ageing populations and its implications for the long-term sustainability of public finances – and the process of pension reform that originally started a long decade ago, and that has in recent years gained intensity due to the economic crisis. As an illustration of the intensity of this process, the second part specifically deals with the latest pension reform trajectory in Spain critically examined from a legal and constitutional perspective. Verbič, Miroslav. Political economy of pension reforms: an empirical investigation // European Journal of Law and Economics. Vol. 47 (2019), issue 2, p. 171-232.

We examine effects of political institutions on the probability of introducing pension reforms. A novel dataset is constructed that tracks the systematic development of pension legislation in 36 countries for the period 1970–2013 by focusing on mandatory pay-as-you-go, occupational, and supplementary pension reforms. The evidence highlights the fundamental importance of political institutions in shaping the probability of pension reforms, after controlling for potentially confounding effects of demographic structure, preferences for redistribution and macroeconomic fundamentals. Countries with stronger constraints on the chief executive, non-fractionalized political competition with moderate political power of government and opposition parties with centrist parties in power, and fiscal federalism in the presence of electoral rules with vote sharing thresholds and a high degree of regional autonomy are significantly more likely to introduce pension reforms. The beneficial effects of executive constraints, political competition and inter-jurisdictional federalism on reforms are robust to several misspecification checks, unobserved heterogeneity, and country-specific time trends. We show that when pension reforms occur, some layers of political institutions strengthen public and private pensions relative to GDP while others tend to weaken it.

The 2017 edition of Pensions at a Glance highlights the pension reforms undertaken by OECD countries over the last two years. Moreover, one special chapter focuses on flexible retirement options in OECD countries and discusses people's preferences regarding flexible retirement, the actual use of these programs and the impact on benefit levels. This edition also updates information on the key features of pension provision in OECD countries and provides projections of retirement income for today's workers. It offers indicators covering the design of pension systems, pension entitlements, the demographic and economic context in which pension systems operate, incomes and poverty of older people, the finances of retirement-income systems and private pensions.

I agree with Calabresi's general distinction between Economic Analysis of Law and Law and Economics. However, these broad categories may obscure important differences between types of law and economics scholarship. I would distinguish positive economic analysis from normative economic analysis, and positivist legal analysis from nonpositivist analysis. The four categories generated by these distinctions provide a more fine-grained map of the styles of reasoning in law and economics, and has implications for the future of law and economics.

The Roman empire was legally pluralistic. But what exactly does this entail in concrete terms? With the growth in historical studies of legal pluralism in the Roman empire, some significant differences in approach have emerged. This article tests and clarifies some of the limits in the current 'legal pluralism' conceptual landscape, focussing on disputes and dispute resolution. It is argued that a clearer distinction should be drawn between 'normative' and 'jurisdictional' pluralism, though both approaches still raise certain conceptual problems. [---]

Classical and Hellenistic Greek laws and dowry practices were generally more progressive and provided more protections for wives than early Roman marriage law and practice. Roman dowry law then witnessed a series of significant developments over the course of the republic, beginning with the time when the Romans were coming into increased contact with Greek culture. Changes in social attitudes towards the conditions for women in marriage, their ability to control their dowries, and their right to own property, seem to have been responsible for these transformations in Roman family law. Wang, Qiang. In a cage of law: liability imputation system in the tort law on kept animals : a Chinese – German comparative study // European Review of Private Law. Vol. 27 (2019), issue 3, p. 617-646.

The imputation of liability for damages caused by kept animals found in China's tort law is a unique, synthetic, and multidimensional dual system. On the one hand, hazard-based liability is the dominant factor, and on the other is fault-based liability the auxiliary factor. The Tort Law on kept animals is oriented towards the types of liability for damages caused by kept animals, rather than towards categories of animal types, and it categorizes liability degrees under both normal and special circumstances. While underlining the merits achieved by this liability imputation system in terms of its structure (on the macro-level), this article also probes into the problems and difficulties arising out of some key junctures (on the micro-level), especially as the system is put into practice and its operational complexity is revealed. Because of the strong affinity of the Chinese civil law, and especially tort law, with its German counterpart, this article references the German tort law on animal keeper's liability for an historical and comparative legal analysis, bringing more light to the Chinese system of liability. This article explores how working fathers are conceptualised within the UK's work-family law and policy framework and whether a dominant ideology of fatherhood can be discerned. The socio-legal literature on men and masculinities is considered alongside established feminist theory on families, paid work and unpaid care to provide a backdrop to the analysis of current policy provision in this area. Three 'ideal' type ideologies of fatherhood are identified ('absent', 'involved' and 'active') which are used to critically examine the current legal framework. [---]

The paper considers a household family comprising of husband, wife and their child. Each parent consumes a private good and contributes voluntarily for a household public good which is child's welfare. When divorce occurs, the court has an ex ante transfer mechanism for the parents such that truthful revelation of valuation of child's welfare by each parent becomes strategyproof. Based on this, the sole custody of child is assigned to the parent having the highest value.

However, the new code substantially simplified the previous version of the code in an attempt to attenuate the process of 'box-ticking'. [--] This article elucidates the history of box-ticking, and the reasons why companies succumb to it, since Adrian Cadbury pioneered the concept of 'comply-or-explain' in 1992, before proposing an exclusively principles-driven approach to the Corporate Governance Code which would alleviate box-ticking and fulfill the original aspirations of Cadbury over a quarter of a century ago.

This paper argues that China has a clearer and more consistent position in its responsive engagement than in active engagement. In other words, China is more affirmative in making defensive coalitions opposing TRIPS-plus standards proposed by developed countries than promoting its own IP initiatives regionally or plurilaterally. This contribution proposes a novel approach, which combines traditional legal analysis with the use of a quantitative method, to analyse the standards employed in case law in a given area. The goal of our Data-Based Case Law (DBCL) is determining the meaning of relations between standards (considered in pairs) and appreciating the statistical significance of the resulting relations. We submit that this combined approach may be employed in any area of the law where there is a substantial body of judicial decisions. We demonstrate the functioning of our DBCL in relation to copyright law in the European Union (EU). Copyright has been subject to a limited harmonisation of the laws of individual EU Member States. [---] The concept, and intentionally unfamiliar terminology, of ‘contagious lawmaking’ creates a space for both fleshing out, and problematizing, the phenomenon of the dynamic and multi-directional transfer of environmental law ideas. This article sets the stage for further study of the global diffusion of environmental law. It does so by identifying the phenomenon of contagious lawmaking and by making explicit some of the terminological and methodological challenges implicated in its study. The article draws on narratives of the ‘global’ diffusion of environmental impact assessment, cited as ‘the most widely adopted environmental management tool in the world’.

В процессе массового внедрения информационных технологий в человеческую жизнь классическое трудовое правоотношение, ориентированное на промышленный труд, подвергается трансформации. Возникновение новых нетипичных форм труда (труд через онлайн-платформы, дистанционный труд и др.) приводит не только к количественному росту специальных норм трудового законодательства, не все из которых оптимальным образом отражают интересы сторон трудовых отношений, но и к тому, что классическое понятие трудового отношения и трудового договора становится применимым к сужающемуся кругу работающих. This contribution focuses on the so-called passing-on problem in actions for repayment of charges levied by Member States in breach of EU law. 'Passing-on' occurs when the economic burden of a charge levied from a business is passed on to burden that business' customers, and possibly even further down the supply chain. [---] Using examples from their home jurisdictions Sweden and Norway, the authors demonstrate that the passing-on problem is a multi-million euro issue which remains governed by diverging national laws, albeit subject to some restrictions developed by the Court of Justice in the absence of EU harmonization. With a view to safeguarding legal certainty, the effective protection of EU law rights, and the elimination of random discrepancies among national rules that are crucial to the proper functioning of the internal market, the authors call for EU harmonization of the legal issues triggered by passing-on. To that end, the authors present two alternative models for harmonization.

This paper examines changes in the practice of street culture among non-violent young adult men. Many individuals who participate in street culture behave and talk in a pretty rough way among each other and act almost aggressively. This is done for establishing a certain reputation and self-image that relates to street culture rules and it is even widespread among non-violent players of this milieu. A comprehensive look on their behavior includes modifications of street culture practices in adult life. Another aspect of the fluid nature of street culture are crumbling ethnic barriers in this milieu in Germany. [---]

This article contrasts legal approaches to bias with a range of biases, particularly cognitive biases, familiar to scientists who study human cognition and decision-making. [---]

The engagement of conservative, populist governments with constitutional reform and constitution-making is perceived as a significant threat to the rule of law and democracy within the European Union. Constitutionalists often assume a relation of mutual exclusion between populism and constitutionalism. [---] The article first discusses populist constitutionalism in the context of the two, main modern constitutional traditions: the modernist and the revolutionary ones. Second, I discuss the populist critique of liberal constitutionalism, with a central focus on the recent cases of right-wing populism in power in East-Central Europe. Four dimensions are prominent: (i) popular sovereignty as the key justificatory claim of populism; (ii) majority rule as the main populist mode of government; (iii) instrumentalism as the legal-practical approach of populists; and (iv) legal resentment as the populists' main attitude toward public law. Politik und Verfassung stehen in einem komplizierten Verhältnis zueinander. Das Recht gibt der Demokratie ihre notwendigen Spielregeln und trägt so zur Legitimation politischer Herrschaft bei, soll den politischen Prozess aber weder in inhaltlicher noch in organisatorischer Sicht unnötig einengen. Ob das Grundgesetz diesen Erwartungen gerecht werden kann, liegt maßgeblich daran, wie die entsprechenden Verfassungsnormen, vor allem Art. 21 und 38 GG, verstanden werden. Entgegen der Tendenz, sie mit überzogenen und nicht hinreichend reflektierten Anforderungen an die Politik zu überfordern, möchte dieser Beitrag die Realität der politischen Struktur und den Gedanken der Beeinflussbarkeit verbindlicher Entscheidungen zu Leitlinien des Verfassungsverständnisses im Recht der Politik machen.

About 37 state constitutions around the world feature non-justiciable thick moral commitments ('constitutional directives'). These directives typically oblige the state to redistribute income and wealth, guarantee social minimums, or forge a religious or secular identity for the state. They have largely been ignored in a constitutional scholarship defined by its obsession with the legitimacy of judicial review and hostility to constitutionalising thick moral commitments other than basic rights. This article presents constitutional directives as obligatory telic norms, addressed primarily to the political state, which constitutionalise thick moral objectives. [---] speed that such algorithms provide, increasingly relying on them to aid with consequential public-sector functions, including tax administration, regulatory oversight, and benefits administration. [---] Can algorithmic governance be squared with legal principles of governmental transparency? We analyze this question and conclude that machine-learning algorithms' relative inscrutability does not pose a legal barrier to their responsible use by governmental authorities. [---]

In computer science, data is an ‘elementary’ piece of information that is coded or codifiable. Thus, generally speaking, information generally includes the processing of more data, i.e. more ‘elementary information’. Nonetheless, if access to a considerable amount of data leads inevitably to more information, an information overdose – to indicate that phenomenon resulting from the excess of data – certainly leads to less transparency. The output of too much data is namely a kind of ‘opacity for confusion’, with information overload causing just disorientation. [---]

These changes represent an interesting development in a state usually considered an exponent for a high level of transparency in the public sector. We analyse how the Act has made it possible to reject applications for information to be used for ministerial advice and pertaining to documents exchanged between ministers and MPs, and we discuss the introduction of an article enabling the rejection of applications solely on the grounds that they will use considerable administrative resources. To date, data security concerns have bewildered the legal system and regulated entities alike. But this does not have to be the case. Although some commentators have argued that having a statute or regulation governing data security would be inflexible and undesirable, this article suggests that a rule is in fact possible if it maintains the right focus. Specifically, the statute or regulation should focus on the procedures by which companies consider and adopt or reject their data security policies, rather than the substance of their ultimate decisions. In essence, the question becomes whether people entrusted with sensitive data act in good faith, rather than whether they act "reasonably."

Scott, Paul F. Secrecy and surveillance: lessons from the law of IMSI catchers // International Review of Law, Computers & Technology. Vol. 33 (2019), issue 3, p. 349-371.

Recent years have seen a new and welcome transparency as to the legal framework governing many of the state's surveillance activities in the United Kingdom. The decline of secrecy as to law, however, is only one side of the coin. There remains a significant secrecy as to fact: not only when and where the state's capacities are deployed, but also what those capacities are. Taking as an example the situation of 'IMSI catchers' – devices which permit the detection of mobile phones and interception of its communications – this contribution suggest that this degree of factual secrecy makes it difficult (perhaps impossible) to secure accountability for the conduct of state surveillance, notwithstanding the new era of legal clarity in which we find ourselves.

The article looks into the case involving Fabiano Antoniani, who, following a major road accident, was left tetraplegic. Marco Cappato drove him to a Swiss clinic where Mr. Antoniani took his own life by self-administration of lethal pentobarbital sodium. Cappato was put on trial, but the Italian Constitutional Court urged the Parliament to decriminalise assisted suicide in extremely serious cases. From a comparison with other European countries, approaches range from restrictive (banning both active euthanasia and assisted suicide), to entirely permissive. An intermediate approach only entails a ban on active euthanasia. [--]

Researchers and international institutions have tried to solve a fundamental paradox in the politics of migration. While introducing stricter migration policy stands high on the agenda of many countries, demographic facts suggest that they will need to introduce more extensive labour immigration to avoid labour shortages. [---] This article explores one of the political options for resolving this: regulating the movement of natural persons through free trade agreements. This article examines the manner in which the rise of populism affects the use of international law by domestic courts. It argues that populism may have a negative effect on the willingness of domestic courts to refer to international law. It further argues that although such response is understandable, it is regrettable, since incorporation of international law into domestic court rulings can serve as a counter-populism measure. Maintaining international law as part of the domestic legal discourse is particularly important in a populist setting, for two reasons. [---]

The aim of this article is to attempt constructing a conceptual framework and define the right to migration security and include it in the Europe-wide discourse on the migration crisis. In the adopted approach, the right to migration security is a third-generation right, i.e. a solidarity right in the doctrine of human rights. [---] The study analyses the range of the right to security in the context of human security and points out the necessity of ensuring the security of migration processes, which poses a special challenge to the international system of human rights. The authors also focus on highlighting the strengths of third-generation rights as a remedy to the problems faced by the international community. Finally, the authors propose to include the right to migration security in the EU's system for the protection of fundamental rights and the guarantees functioning within the area of freedom, security and justice.

Hilal-Harvald, Malthe. The multilocal genesis and migration of the European face veil bans // Zeitschrift für ausländisches öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht (2019) Nr. 1, S. 121-153.

Since 2010, Europe has seen the enactment of bans on face veils in the public space in several European jurisdictions. The French and Belgian face veil bans have been challenged and upheld in the European Court of Human Rights in three instances. These bans have caused a vast amount of scholarly literature; most of which criticizes the face veil bans for being unjustified restrictions on the freedom of religion. [---] Thus, the objective of this article is to illuminate the migratory dynamics that have led France, Belgium, Austria, the Netherlands, and Denmark to adopt the same legal strategy towards the perceived dangers of the Islamic face veil. By applying the metaphor of migration of constitutional ideas to the legislative histories of the five case studies as well as the links between them, this article demonstrates how the idea of banning face veils cannot be traced back to a single jurisdiction or legal tradition. This article offers an internal critique of the European Court of Human Rights' deferential approach to the content and limits of the right to vote (under the right to free and fair elections, article 3 of protocol 1 to the European Convention on Human Rights). Rather than imposing an independent theory of democratic rights, the critique is internal as it relies on the court's own conception of democracy developed under article 10 ECHR (freedom of expression) and article 11 ECHR (freedom of reunion and assembly). It uses normative democratic theory to show that the court's conception under those rights reveals an utmost concern for political inclusion and that this conception is systematically used by the court to balance alleged interferences with this article.
